THE BACK PORCH RANGER

by Melissa Kay Bishop

If you are lucky this year, a songbird will build a nest somewhere around your house or yard. Watching the process of nest building, to seeing the babies leave the nest, is a spring time pleasure. But along with this pleasure, there is peril. Baby birds are vulnerable to many dangers from predators (mainly cats) and falling out of the nest. So what's a well meaning citizen of the earth to do when they find an injured or orphaned baby bird? There are many myths and misunderstandings about nests, hatchlings, and fledgling birds and here they will be debunked and give you a guide as to what to do when you find a bird in need. After all, very few people go through life never encountering a bird that needs some help. So arm yourself with knowledge, the most important tool to doing the right thing.

If you should find a fledgling on the ground, which is a baby bird with all his feathers, but is not quite flying yet, the first thing vou should do is nothing but watch. Give the bird at least an hour to see if it is being tended to by a mother. Some birds such as robins and mocking birds spend about a week on the ground learning to fly and find food while being looked after. If time goes by and there is no adult in sight, see if you can find the nest. We have all heard the rumor that if you touch a baby bird, the mother will abandon it because she will smell humans. This is not true. Birds do not have a well developed sense of smell, so if you can, place the baby back in the nest and it will be well looked after.

If however, the bird is injured, or there is no nest or mother bird in sight and you feel that you have found an orphan, the first thing to do is call the professionals. If you do not have a wildlife rehabilitation center in your area, call a veterinarian. Often times, they will either take the bird or be able to direct you to someone who can. If you get the idea of taking the bird in to raise yourself, think again.

"It is against the law to keep songbirds if you are not licensed," said Jo Ann Thompson, a long-time licensed songbird rehabilitator. "This is true all over the United States." Songbirds are protected by state and the federal government and you must be approved based on experience and having a facility to keep the birds that meets government standards.

If the thought of going against the law doesn't deter you from bringing home baby, then knowing what you are getting into might. Yes, the thought of raising a wild bird that may turn into a beloved family pet sounds like fun and educational for your children, but if you don't know what you are doing, the educational experience will be that of teaching how to watch a living thing die due to negligence.

Raising baby birds is very involved and time consum> ing. First of all, they have to be fed every 30 minutes from dawn until dusk. This alone is a difficult task for those have their own families feed and lives to live. And if you feed it the wrong thing, vou could kill it. You also have to take the place of the mother bird by making sure they are always warm. A chill could be the end for them

So, if you find a bird in need, call a professional or look up wildlife rehabilitators on the Web. Good intentions can go awry and this is one way you can help give songbirds a leg up. The other most important thing we can do is to be a responsible pet owner.

"Fifty-percent of all the birds I get are injured or orphaned because of a cat," Thompson said. Felines are the number two destructive force of songbird populations, only second to habitat destruction. So, if you have a cat that is used to his romps outside, try to limit or do away with this habit during the nest and fledgling season. Distract kitty with a good game of Chase the String and soon he will forget about going out for a hunt.
